Chevrolet Nomad Concept

at the 2004 Detroit Auto Show

Have we seen this before? Well, historically, there is one that appeared in 1954, based on a Corvette (presumably, the C1). Then there was a '99 Nomad concept that really would have been ahead of the game in crossover vehicles. But now in '04, Simon Cox has penned another Chevy Nomad, a 2+2 with behind-the-seat space for gear.

Based on GM's new Kappa architecture, the RWD vehicle has a 107 inch wheelbase and an overall length of 155 inches. With the wheels pushed fore and aft, there is a sense of a long hood yet wagon-like proportions to the cabin. The belt line is comparatively high, so the seating sense is being surrounded by the vehicle. Interior accents combine leather and aluminum in a way that evoke an earlier time (say 1954) as well as the future (if not the present). Anticipating use to haul cargo, not only is there a sliding panel that moves over the tailgate, but the rear roof panel can be removed.
